

BELLATRON

The Ancient Forest gave home to the most usual, normal creatures like the bear, the squirrel, the frog,
and of course...

The robot.

Most robots kept to themselves and didn't like to spend time with other robots or even other animals in the Ancient Forest. They liked to hide in caves under rocks, in big hollow logs, and in thick grassy fields.

There's one robot though, that was not like the others.
Her name is Bellatron.

This robot didn't like to hide under rocks or in grassy fields, not unless she was playing a game of hide-and-seek, of course. But she didn't get to play this very often because she didn't have anyone to play with.

And playing it by herself got tiresome very quickly, as she always knew where she was hiding.

Bellatron desperately wanted to play hide-and-seek with someone else, so she searched the Ancient Forest for a friend to play with.

She climbed the trees and asked the birds to play, but they were too busy doing fancy flying aerial tricks and maneuver's to be bothered with a simple hiding game.

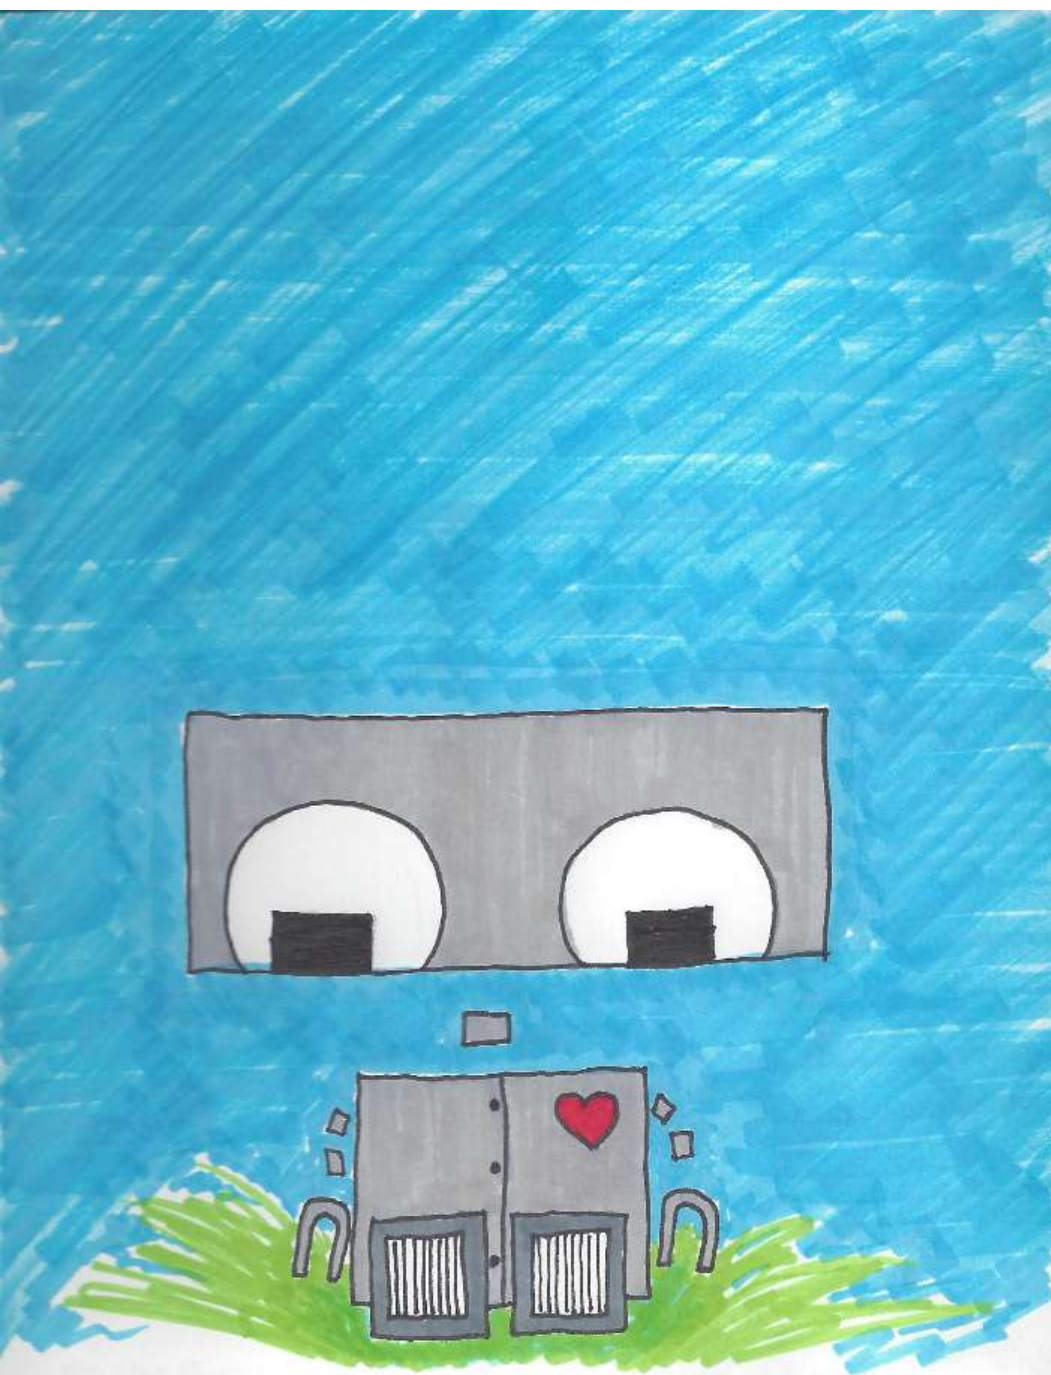

Bellatron then went to the swamps and asked the alligators to play, but they were too lazy to move for anything other than dinner.

Then Bellatron requested that the beasts try to find her, but the beasts had far too much hullabaloo, tumult, and hubbub to attend to.

Bellatron thought she knew who would want to find her, so she enquired of the zombies, but they thought that she did not have enough epidermis for them to hunt for her.

Bellatron soon became discouraged. She wanted to be alone, like all the other robots.

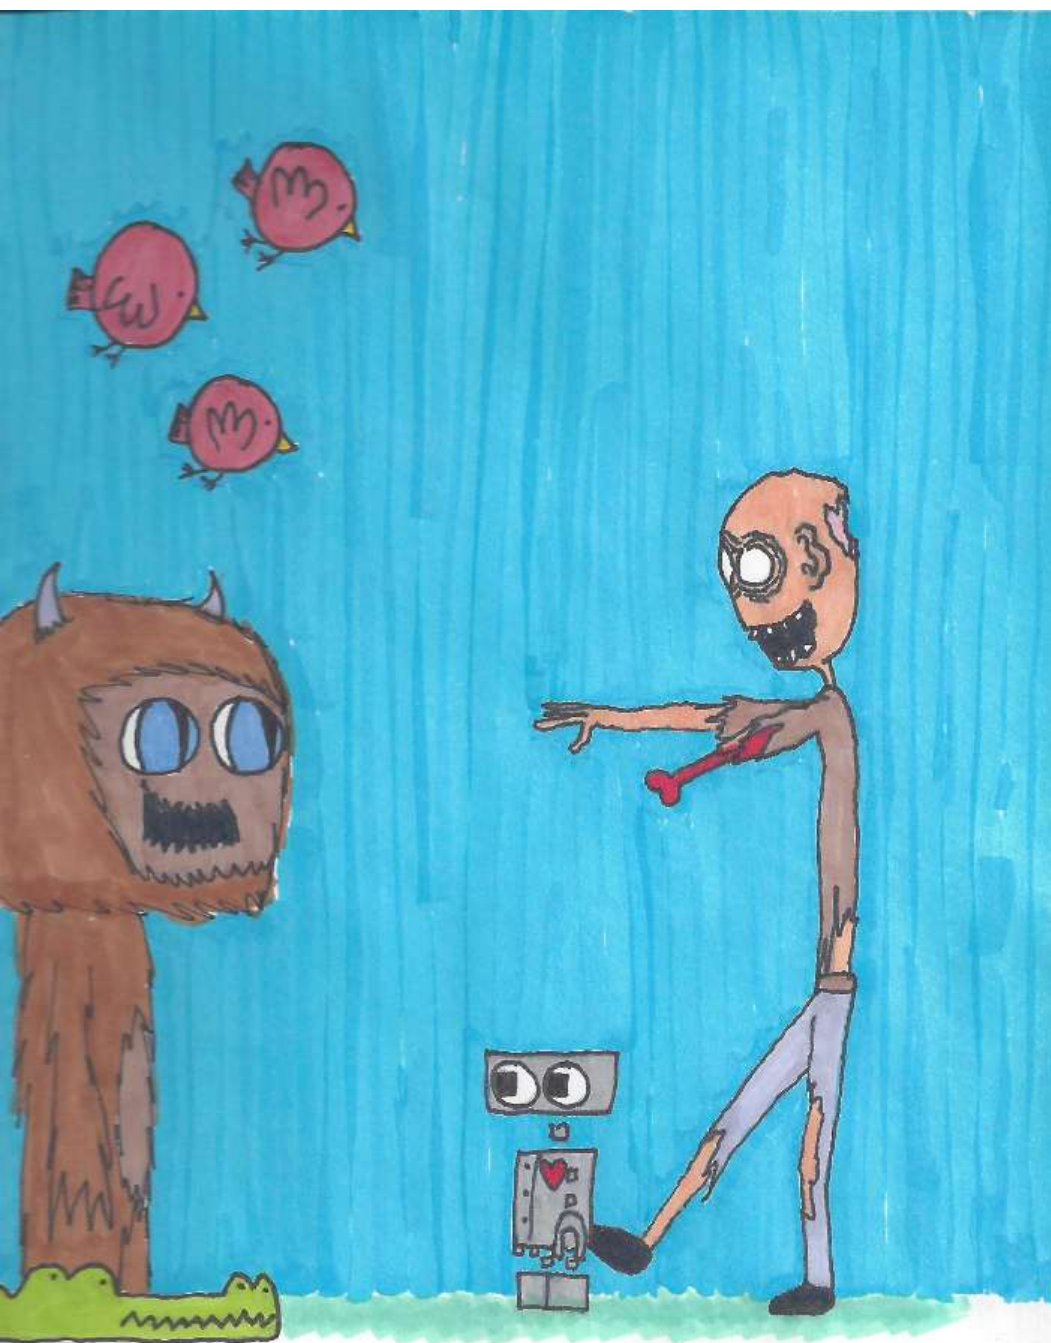

So she flew up into the air, and in trying to find some peace, the birds saw how well she flew, and began to bother her with questions, so she flew away as fast as she could, but she could not lose the birds.

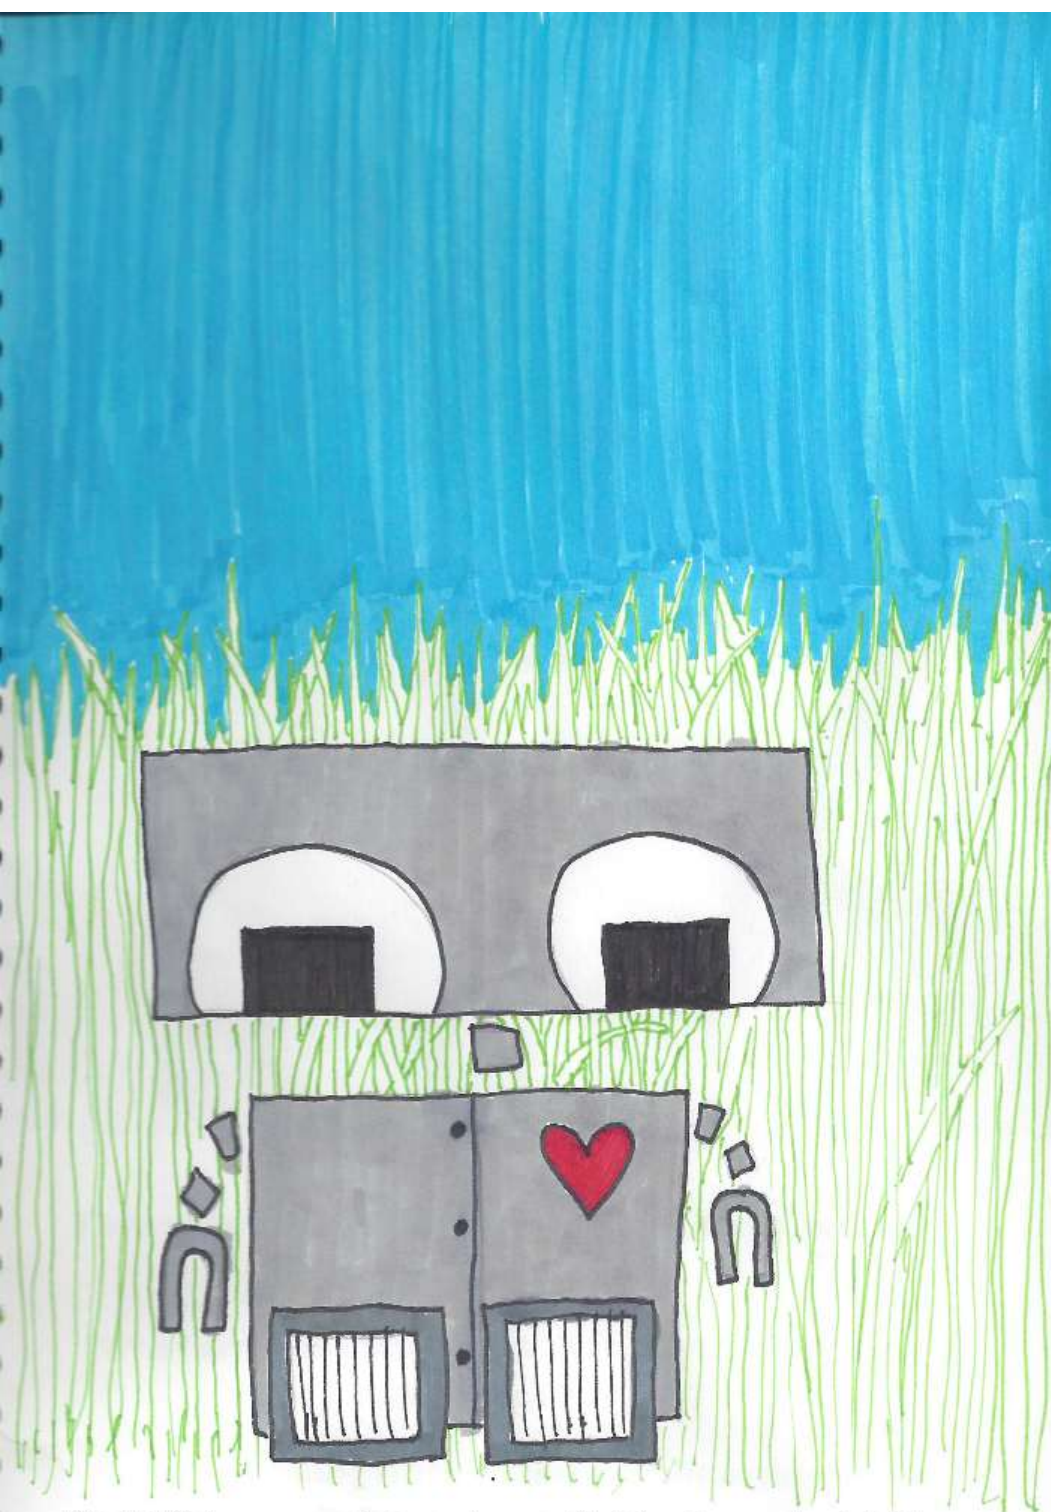

Bellatron decided to lose the birds in the swamp. She dove under the murky water, and every so often she popped her head out from beneath the scum to look around. The birds waited in the tree's nearby, and now she had impressed the filth covered alligators as well.

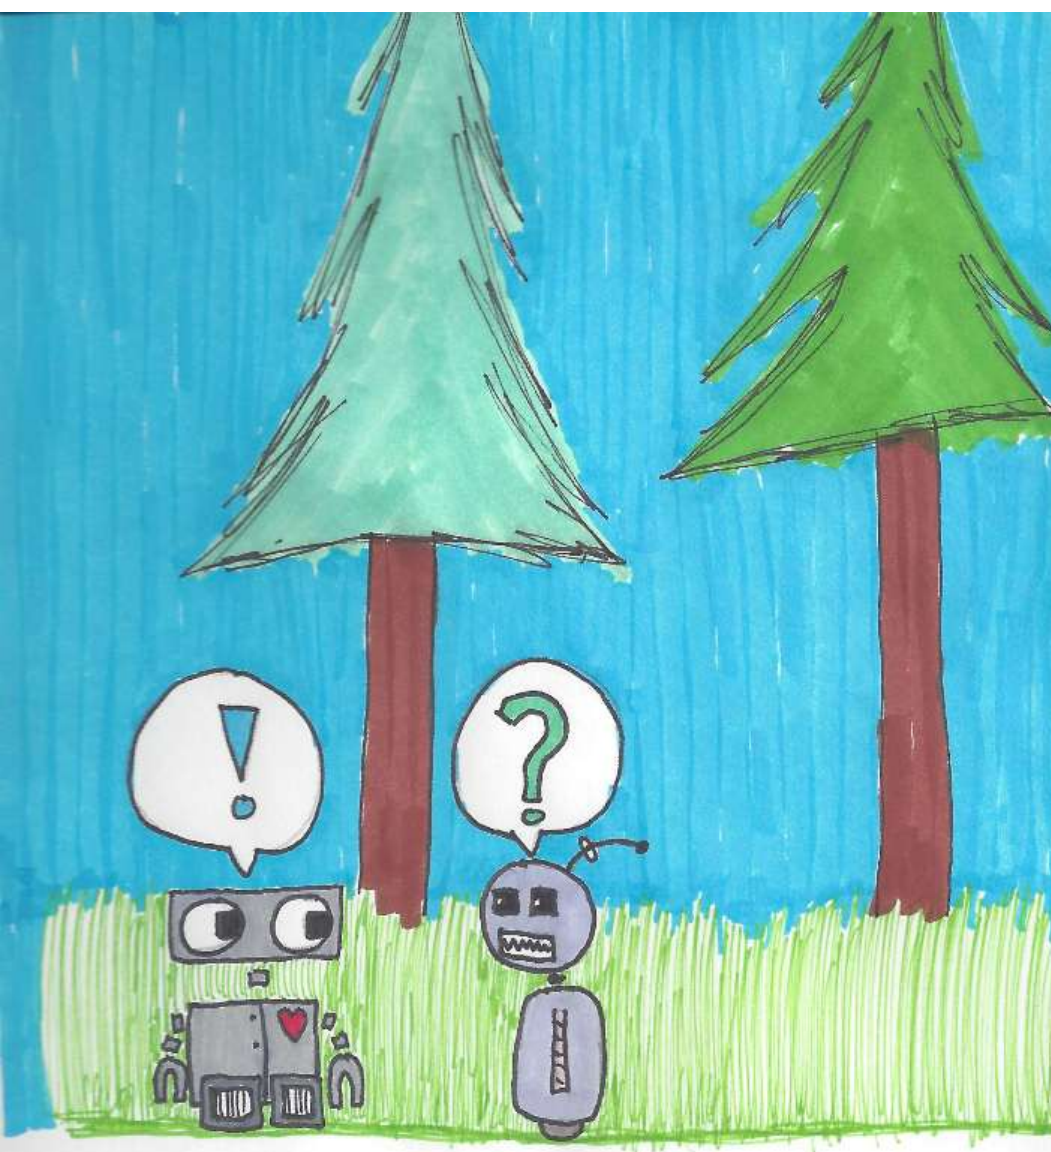

Wanting to sulk on her own, Bellatron ran from the swamp and joined in the beasts' brouhaha, hoping to scare away the others. The beasts though, captivated by Bellatrons ruckusing, wanted to learn how to cause a commotion like her.

Bellatron thought that nobody would dare follow her to the zombies, who were then so happy that she brought them so much food they wanted to befriend her, in hopes she would bring them more.

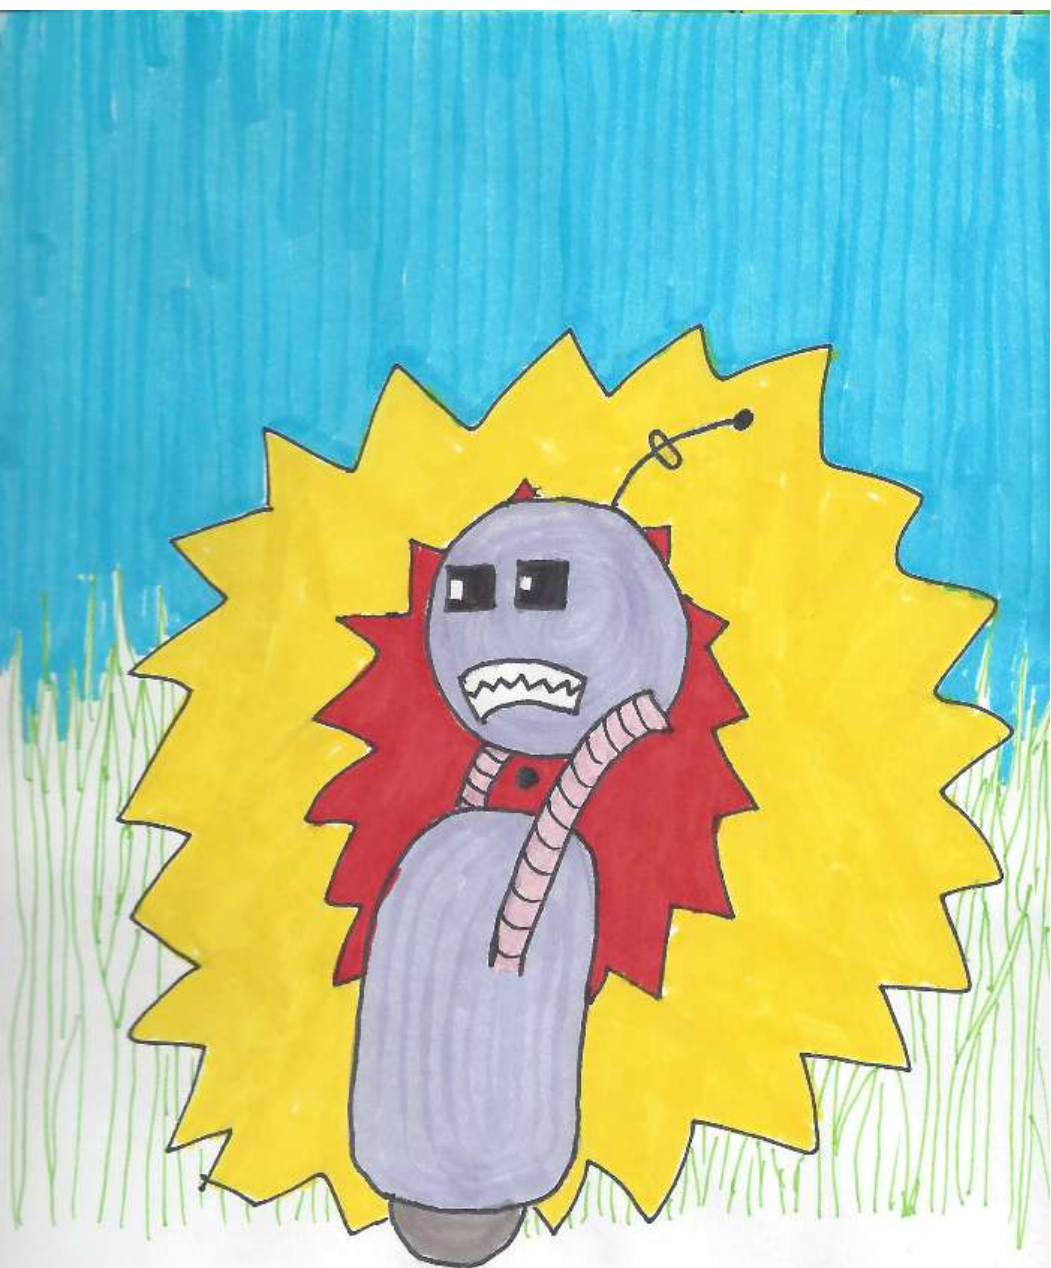

So Bellatron ran into a grassy field, where she hid in the long thick pasture, and nobody could find her.

Then suddenly, she realized she was hiding next to another robot.

"What are you doing in this field, Bellatron?" the robot asked her.

"I'm hiding from all those pesky creatures!" Bellatron exclaimed.

"Why would you want to hide from all your friends?"
The robot asked. It was then that Bellatron realized she was finally getting to play hide-and-seek with a crowd of new friends.

Bellatron also realized that the other robots were just sad because the animals in the Ancient Forest were too busy to play with them, so she went throughout the kingdom, inviting all the robots to play with her and her new friends.

And they all learned each other's games, and played happily ever after.
